Each cell may be considered as a self-regulating mechanism probably composed of colloidal systems, each one of which is separated from the other by some limiting membrane. These systems may act independently but harmoniously, so that a delicate state of equilibrium is maintained. In a larger sense, this conception may be applied to each individual organism, The various separate activities may mutually influence and control one another, with the result that a definite and constant unity of structure and activity is maintained throughout the whole organism. Such functional integration implies a ready transmission of influence between different parts of the living system.
