Excerpt from Railroads: Statements and Reflections Thereon: Particularly With Reference to the Proposed Railroad Without a Tunnel, and the Competition for the Line Between London and Brighton Of the three propositions before the Committee of the House of Commons, viz. Sir John Rennie s, Mr. Stephenson s, and Mr. Cundy s, it is irrefragable that the first is inferior to the other two, on account of the great length of its tunnels, and the dangerous steepness of its inclined planes. Including Shoreham, it is 55.9 miles in length, and has no fewer than five tunnels delightful specimens of Tartarus, by way of preparing visitors for the Elysium of Brighton. It presents, besides, 22 undulating inclined planes, of which 6 rise 20 feet per mile, for the distance of 22 miles and 23 chains, and require the power of 1.7 lbs. Per ton to work them 15 miles per hour, or 89 minutes. Another of these planes is 1 mile 60 chains, with a rise of 47 feet per mile, and will require a station engine and a power of...
