This item is printed on demand - Print on Demand Neuware - Seminar paper from the year 2012 in the subject English - Literature, Works, grade: 1,3, University of Osnabrück, language: English, abstract: You shall not steal. You shall not lie, neither shall any man deceive his neighbour.(Leviticus 19, Douay-Rheims Bible) This concept has not only long been a convention for religion but also a canon for society. Children have always been taught early that stealing is illegal. Representations can be found in several literary works as for example in Aesop's fables. The issue of moral education was also a current subject during the Victorian era. Especially in the end of the century, when education was made available for nearly all social classes (Children), it came to special interest again. As Eric Hopkins argues, religious and moral education was needed if the ever-growing numbers of boys and girls were to be disciplined and turned into conforming members of the new urban society (Hopkins 37). Many books were used to convey a moral sense and works, which did not offer certain moral aspects or which dealt with...
