Excerpt from Biographical History of Massachusetts, Vol. 1: Biographies and Autobiographies of the Leading Men in the State This ignorance was due not simply to the condescension which Mr. Lowell observes with which to his time all Europe regarded all America. It was the personal ignorance in each continent of the inhabitants of the other. Illustrations of this ignorance may be found even in Lord Chatham's well-known speech in which he reviews the American State Papers and in Edmund Burke's acknowledged surprise when he studied the resources of New England. It is pathetic, indeed, to read in the diaries of the loyalists who took up their homes in London while the Revolution went on, that the men of England regarded them with a sort of pity, only too plainly expressed, and wondered what was their business in England. Such considerations, although briefly stated, are enough to account for the pride with which Massachusetts men look back on their own history. They have been encouraged in their pride in the history of the Commonwealth by thoughtful men in all parts of the world. Carlyle said truly that Democracy announced on Bunker Hill that she is born and will envelope the whole world. And in one way and another, that statement is assented to by the modern students of history. I was in London in 1859, when we heard the news of John Brown's attack on Harper's Ferry. At that time the London Times was the most constant enemy of liberal institutions; and yet that journal, in a leading editorial said, the sympathy of the people of Massachusetts has a title to the consideration of the world.
