Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from The Religion of Judah David and Solomon established in the thought of the Hebrew people Jehovah as the national Deity. In his name successful wars of conquest had been waged. All the chief sanctuaries were his. In remote districts some local Canaanitish Baal might still be honored. But in general Jehovah reigned supreme in the religious thought and practice of the Hebrew people. Other nations had their deities, and the reality of these gods was conceded by the prevalent thought of Israel in this period. The primitive worship of Jehovah, the worship of the wilderness, is largely a matter of conjecture. It involved animal sacrifice, perhaps at stated periods but certainly at times of confusion and crisis. The sacred places, where sacrifices might be offered, were few and unadorned. This primitive worship was very similar to the religious beliefs and practices of the Bedouin of to-day. Upon entrance into Canaan this primitive worship was greatly modified by the religious life of the Canaanites. The religion of the nomad gave place to the religion of the settled agriculturist. The common worship became largely a borrowing from the Canaanites. The three great annual festivals (exodus 23. 14 - 17) entered into the worship of Jehovah from the customs of the Canaanites. The sanctuaries of the Hebrews in Palestine had been sacred places long before their settlement in the land. The mazzebah, or stone column, and the asherah, or wooden pillar - essentials at a Canaanitish altar - became familiar elements in the sacrificial feasts of the Hebrews.
