The mathematician is perfect as far as he understands mathematics; but there are problems unsolved. The chemist is perfect as far as his analysis extends, but he is still learning. A child may be perfect as a child, but he does not remain a child; he progresses to manhood, and from manhood to Godhood. Eternal life is freedom to progress; death is to be bound by limitations. Adam fell that man might be; that spirits might have bodies of flesh. An evil spirit can never become a child and have a body, he remains in his present condition; those spirits that rebelled and were cast out of heaven, cut themselves off from further progression; this is their condemnation. The student who masters arithmetic does well, but if he ignore algebra and geometry, he cuts himself off from filling important positions in life that require a knowledge of these higher branches; and there is no good-will nor friendship that can put him and keep him in a position that, through lack of training, he is unable to fill. So, a man who observes the moral law does well, so far; but should he fail to accept the new birth, as offered by the atonement of Christ, and reject the higher law, he cuts himself off from the celestial kingdom. As an honorable man of the earth, he may come forth in the resurrection and inherit the terrestrial kingdom, typified by the...
