Not illustrated. 1910 Excerpt: .indications for combining a number of gynecologic operations at one sitting may be broadly stated to lie in the avoidance of the necessity of repeated anesthesia, and in the gain of time and lessening of expense for the patient. An additional reason for performing all required operations at one sitting, which pertains especially to prolapsus operations, is contained in the fact that where the operations are spread out over two or more sittings the results of the operation first performed may be nullified or marred while awaiting the second sitting. The various operations entering into combination in the treatment of prolapsus, being intended to be mutually supporting and adjuvant, should all be performed at one sitting. Each operator who frequently performs gynecologic operations in combination has probably set for himself a time limit of safe anesthesia beyond which he is unwilling to protract operative procedures. In...
