Springer-Verlag New York Inc., United States, 2012. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Historically, explanations for the origins of behavior have vacillated between nurturist and nativist camps. Nurturists emphasize environmental determinants of development, whereas nativists emphasize biological determinants. Contemporary developmentalists reject such dichotomies on the assumption that the organization of behavior is driven by interactions between environmental and biological regulators. For example, Sameroff (1989; Sameroff Fiese, 1989) reminds us that throughout the life span, development of the biological organism has meaning only when considered in relation to its contextual environment because it is the events in the environment that trigger expression of the genotype or, at minimum, work in transactional relationship with biological regulators. Put another way, the expression (phenotype) of the organism's biological makeup (genotype) will always be affected by the environments in which the organism develops. Sameroff argues that the search for biological regulators of development led investigators to downplay the importance of environmental regulators. He proposes that the environment should have equal status with the phenotype and genotype as a developmental regulatory system. Environment refers to the environmental context(s) within which...
