A careful driver will blanket his horse in winter when he halts for a time, so the animal will not get chilled and take cold. The barnyard fowls, too, should be properly provided with shelter, as well as the pig, the dog, and other domestic animals. Out west on the range, unprotected by a suitable shelter, many of these animals perish in winter, and nearly all of them become very poor, if not sick. Why do these animals generally go in herds or large numbers? Tell of some of their difficulties in obtaining food and water, as well as shelter in winter. Often they eat snow for water, and paw away the snow to get at the grass underneath. When the snows in the mountains become too deep for them, the herd migrates to the valleys. Some animals gnaw the bark off live trees for food; and very often the early pioneers had to cut down trees and allow their horses and cattle to eat the small and tender twigs to keep them from starving in the winter time. Discuss the wild winter dwellers, especially the fur-bearing animals: the beaver, marten, lynx, bear, wolf, coyote, etc. How do they get their food? How are they protected from the cold? Study one or two in detail with the aid of stuffed specimens or good pictures, and thus illustrate the lives of the others. Make a dog kennel; a bird house, etc. LESSON XXIII...
