Stephen Hawking on the Pequod is a philosophical writing written in dialog form. The subject of the writing is to identify the source of modern immoral behaviors and to argue for a solution to such behaviors. The argument centers on the fact that science is the main problem solver for various needs of modern humanity, and yet, science cannot solve modern immoral problems because science does not, by nature, study ethics. To do that requires the discipline of philosophy. However, in his book, the Grand Design, Stephen Hawking has declared that philosophy is dead. This author disagrees. Philosophy only needs to win back its power in society to be able to address the problems of current immorality. This dialog, borrowing its characters from both fact and fiction, intends to identify how philosophy lost its problem solving power to science, and how philosophy must then win back that power, in order to, of its own devices, determine what course should be set to reestablish a moral tone for modern humanity.
