Excerpt from The Brining and Pickling of Cucumbers and Other Vegetables: A List of Publications With Abstracts, September 1938-December 1958, on Cooperative Investigations The cooperative pickle research program, conducted jointly by the Agricultural Research Service of the U. S. Department of Agriculture and the North Carolina Agricultural Experiment Station, was initiated in 1935 as an expansion of a study started about two years earlier by the Department of Horticulture of the Experiment Station. The U. S. Food Fermentation Laboratory, located on the campus of North Carolina State College, is a field station of the Southern Utilization Research and Development Division of the Agricultural Research Service, usda. Knowledge gained through these investigations has already been given wide application by the commercial pickle industry. This information has enabled packers to put up better products and add new items to their lines. Income to both the cucumber grower and the pickle packer has been increased through greater consumption of pickle products and reduction of losses during the brining and manufacturing Operations. Among the most important developments resulting from the Raleigh investigations are: a process for pasteurizing fresh-pack pickles; discovery of the major causes for the softening of commercial salt stock pickles; and factors responsible for the formation of hollow pickles or bloaters both during the brine fermentation of salt stock and the manufacturing of sweet pickles.
