Excerpt from Art Is for Everyone: The English critic Clive Bell once remarked somewhere that though most people readily admit that they understand very little about music, nearly everybody considers himself entitled to an Opinion about art. And a very generally held opinion about the art of the past fifty years is that it is, as a whole, cryptic, perverse, modern, and very confusing. This, of course, is not at all surprising. A great many things have happened to art during the first half of our century, and the enormous variety of techniques developed by artists during this period - the apparently endless and conflicting avenues through which they have approached their aesthetic problems - are apt to strike the average man, who gives a hurried look at the end product, as bewildering indeed. Yet if one takes the trouble to find out what the artist is doing and to ask oneself a few really searching questions about what aspects of art one really values, it turns out that the confusion is not in the mind of today's artist but in the mind of today's layman, who has simply not thought enough about art to distinguish that which is aesthetically meaningful from that which is more or less irrelevant to aesthetic enjoyment. Actually, it takes a great deal of looking and a great deal of thinking before the average person is prepared to make these distinctions and to qualify as one who really understands art. Prejudices must be broken down; new ways of seeing must be cultivated. The process is one of mental and spiritual enrichment. But to carry it out, a guiding hand is needed. In this book, Martha Simpson,...
