Excerpt from The Retrospect of Practical Medicine and Surgery, Vol. 52: Being a Half-Yearly Journal, Containing a Retrospective View of Every Discovery and Practical Improvement in the Medical Sciences; January, 1866 But there is still a stronger argument. We have the positive fact that us will live for a considerable time in urine, and therefore we are quite just ed in assuming that other kinds of germinal matter allied to pus, and capable of living under a still greater variety of conditions than pus, would retain their vitality in urine, freces, and other excretions. As numerous facts estab lish is the case with regard to some forms of contagious matter. As we have positive evidence that minute particles of pus may pass through the air, or remain on sponges, clothes, c., for many hours without their vitality being destroyed. Is it not reasonable to assume that the living matter of con tagious diseases, supposing it to be allied to pus, should retain its vitality under the same or under yet more adverse conditions? Does not this view receive confirmation from our experience with regard to the conditions which are favourable to the propagation of contagious fevers? A warm, moist atmosphere, small close rooms, with curtains, carpets, and pleat g of clothes, rags, c., so arranged as to cause air to be pent up in con ned spaces with very slow interchange, -are the circumstances which favour the spread of contagion; and a disposition to prevent currents of air from find ing their way into every part or into any part of an a artment is a mental characteristic of many of those who are too often sh erers from the worst forms of contagious...
