Excerpt from Biology and Control of Avocado Insects and Mites The greatly increased planting of the avocado in recent years has been accompanied by a corresponding increase in the amount of injury caused by insect pests. Some of the insects attacking the avocado are native to California and others are recorded as being of recent occurrence in the state. These pests include defoliating caterpillars and beetles, a number of scale insects (of which the rather recently recorded latania scale is the most important), the avocado brown mite, and a native species of thrips. The insect pests attacking the avocado in Florida and foreign countries have also been included in this bulletin. In a new industry, such as the California avocado industry, it is important to know what pests occur on the same crop in other sections or countries in order that proper precautions may be taken to guard against the entrance of such insects; a complete list of these is given in a later section. Two important pests of the avocado in California, apparently, have already been introduced from other localities. The author wishes to express his appreciation to Professor H. J. Quayle, of the Citrus Experiment Station, who directed the work reported in this paper, and who read and corrected the manuscript. Thanks are also due to Professor Harry S. Smith and to Mr. Walter Ebeling for suggestions and corrections; to Professor P. H. Timberlake for his identifications; and to Mr. D. F. Palmer, who at different times rendered assistance.
