Excerpt from Seed-Borne Parasites: A Bibliography Norton and Leathers (19) in 1918, and their publication has no doubt been influential in the organization Of certified seed production associa tions which are just beginning to realize the importance of the parasite factor in their efforts. If the efforts Of seed producers, seed tradesmen, seed analysts, the manufacturers Of seed disinfectants, and Official agencies could be brought into cooperation on this problem it would take but a short time to reduce the losses through seed-borne parasites to a point where this phase Of disease control would be adequately handled: TO these efforts Should be added those Of the research worker who will find in the problem Of seed-borne parasites an interesting and little-developed field which would be very productive in bringing forward the data needed to show how the multifarious parasites exist within and upon seeds.
