Not illustrated. 1918 Excerpt: .particles of gluten were found to move in an electric field at rates indicating that they carried electric charges and that the phenomenon is electrical in nature. The behavior of the gluten colloid was attributed to the charges conferred upon it by the ioniaz.tion of the weak salts formed by a weak union of the acid or alkalis with the amphoteric gluten. Cohesion is destroyed by the formation of a double electric layer around the particles of gluten. The decrease and disappearance of the potential difference is due to suppression of ionization due to excess of acid present. Dispersion is brought about at a much more rapid rate with the strong acid than with the weak such as carbonic acid in solution. There has been a tendency on the part of most writers since that time to minimize the value of this most interesting and vital...
