Excerpt from Around a Spring: Translated From the French of Gustave Droz Nothing can be more bright and cheerful than these pine huts, with their tall brick chimneys mingling with the foliage, large, flat, reddish roofs overshadowing cracked, propped, disjointed balconies, covered with creepers and wild eglantine, little low doors, and tottering staircases which would creak under the weight of a bird. They stand steeped in the sunlight, scattered hap-hazard on both sides of the road, keeping their balance tolerably well on the sharp slope, among the gnarled chestnut trees which shelter them with their huge branches, uphold them with their gigantic roots, and seem to make a part of their structure. I well remember the flock of ducklings which, startled at my approach the first time I entered the village, fluttered about among a number of half-naked babies lying on a clean white cloth, like Homers phoci on the shore of the sea. The picture is as perfect as ever in my mind. The screaming babies and bewildered ducklings tumbling about among the fat legs and dimpled arms, an old grandmother with outstretched, wrinkled neck surveying the scene through her spectacles, and threatening the rebels with her distaff, and a stout man engaged in cutting poles, laughing till he shook from head to foot. It was a pleasant incident both to eyes and heart; one felt that one was in the midst of worthy people. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books.
