But Stella did not easily get over that night s depression, although it did not prepare her in the least for the terrible news brought her about six weeks later, that at the time she was so overcome with grief at the bare thought of never seeing her father again, he was dying at home as unexpectedly to the rest of the family as to herself In the letters she received it was stated that on the Thursday night he retired to rest as well as usual. No one had been alarmed about him at any time, although it had been noticed that he had never regained his spirits from the time his wife died nearly four months before. During the night he was seized with some internal hemorrhage, and the hastily summoned doctors announced that the case was hopeless and that he had only a few hours to live. At the time that Stella was in an agony of grief about him he lay dying, the difference in the clock between England and the Antipodes bringing it to the very hour when, with senses still acute, he was taking leave of his family and friends and sending loving messages to the daughter so far away. Your leaving home was always a great grief to him, her sister Alice wrote, although he never said much about it, but he couldn t bear to hear any one sing your songs. ust before mother...
