Such advantages would give assistance in discriminating between the thrifty and industrious toilers and those who are careless and indifferent. Hitherto, the best of the workers have been too often tempted to seek their fortunes in the larger towns, or to go abroad to seek their fortunes in distant lands, resulting in the survival of the fittest, but the disappointment of some. If village life be made more attractive, if men can have their allotment or small holding to cultivate, and possibly look forward to an old age pension, if misfortune prevent any provision for the help less period of life, there is no reason why many should not be satisfied to remain at home. A happy and contented peasantry is a country's pride, and to make life more endurable and hopeful by just laws, calculated to improve the lot of the workers, would confer an inestimable benefit upon a sturdy, hard-working class of men, most of whom would greatly appreciate such advantages, and become increasingly contented and grateful subjects of our worthy King, Edward VII. His Majesty has done much upon his own estate at Sandringham and in that district by the erection of well-built cottages and club-rooms, as well as by the provision of allotments, to promote the happiness of his dependents and has set a noble example that is worthy of imitation in the desire to ameliorate the lives of the less fortunate in the battle of life. May not the familiar words of Longfellow's Psalm of Life be altered and adapted:...
