Hewitt.1 Mrs. Hewitt has become known entirely through her contributions to our periodical literature. I am not aware that she has written any prose, but her poems have been numerous and often excellent. A collection of them was published not long ago in an exquisitely tasteful form, by Ticknor Co., of Boston. The leading piece, entitled Songs of Our Land, was by no means the most meritorious, although the largest in the volume. In general, these compositions evince the author's poetic fervor, classicism of taste and keen appreciation of the beautiful, in the moral as well as in the physical world. No one of them, perhaps, can be judiciously commended as a whole, but no one of them is without merit, and there are several which would do credit to any poet in the land -- still even these latter are rather particularly than generally commendable. They lack unity, totality, ultimate effect, but abound in forcible passages. For example: -- Shall I portray thee in thy glorious seeming, Thou that the Pharos of my darkness art? Like the blue lotos on its own clear river Lie thy soft eyes, beloved, upon my soul. Here mid your wild and dark defile, O erawed and wonder-whelmed I stand, And ask, Is this the fearful vale That opens on the shadowy land ? And there the slave -- a slave no more -- Hung reverent up the chain he wore. 1 See Appendix...
