Not illustrated. 1906 Excerpt: . . . will regard it as one of the inexplicable peculiarities of the English race that they are so slow in using the best system of weights and measures yet invented. But the most astonishing thing of all is that a professor in a medical college should advocate going back to the old measures in our Pharmacopoeia, as recently appeared in these columns. What we need is some means of creating a determination on the part of the young doctors entering into practice, to use the metric system as they have been taught. Take every prescription you desire to use, and transcribe it into metric terms, not with that kind of literal accuracy that introduces awkward and unnecessary decimals, but in such form as is best adapted to metric quantities, and memorize it for use in that form, and encourage the druggist to weigh it with metric weights, and not attempt to transpose it. Every young graduate from a respectable medical college should consider it a mark of ignorance to go back to drams and grains. It will be observed that in giving equivalent quantities in the translation, I have used the abbreviation g. for gram. This abbreviation is now employed throughout the whole of Europe almost, in all first-class books, with l. for liter. In my judgement these abbreviations are better than those of our Pharmacopoeia This however is a small matter but one that is worth bearing in mind for future use. At the present time,...
