At the close of the year 1862 the Gold Coast was in a condition of prosperity such as it had never before reached. Interior disturbances had ended with the termination of the Krobo war, the Ashantis were on most friendly terms with the Government and the protected tribes, and every week dozens of their traders, laden with the commodities of the interior, arrived at the sea-coast towns. Never before had trade been so prosperous and the outlook so peaceable, when suddenly, without any warning, a misunderstanding with Ashanti arose and ultimately resulted in hostilities. The matter was...
