Not illustrated. 1915 Excerpt: . . . CHAPTER XX OUT OF THE STORM Paul had looked upon this scene with amazement. He had pulled off his woolen cap and scratched his head. As he knew nothing of underlying causes it was a mystery to him. When they walked out of the house together he kept silent for a moment, but could resist no longer his keen desire to speak frankly. For years I have known thee, Ahteck, he declared, and have always wondered at thy silent ways and thy beliefs in coming evils, but now I must say that I can only wonder at thy amazing folly. Is there a man in Pointe Bleue, among those who have not wives already, who would not give all he has for the love of a woman like Mititesh And now thou art going to see the priest and arrange for thy wedding, with thy face as black as a thunder-cloud and thy manner that of a man about to bury his best beloved one. Indeed I cannot understand thee. But Ahteck made no answer. It may well be that he had not even listened to his friend. They reached the house of the missionaries, mounting the steps to the veranda, on which were many chairs of queerly twisted roots and branches, made by one of the fathers. When they knocked at the door one of the priests opened it and bade them welcome. My father, I have come to speak with Father Laroux,...
