Excerpt from The Education of Girls: A Public Lecture Delivered by James Oliphant, M.A., F. R. S. E. At the Charlotte Square Institution on 30 January 1889 A much more difficult question is that of the proper nature and extent of the demands upon the mental powers. This involves not only the matter of the curriculum, the studies which should be included in a girl s education, and the pro portion in which they should stand to each other, but also the equally important subject of the best methods of teach ing the different subjects. Leaving the question, of the total quantity of work to be spoken of later, I would point out, in the first place, in regard to method, that the ideal of every teacher must be to render the head work more intelligent and less mechanical; to lessen the tax on the memory by putting the facts of knowledge in the form in which they can be most easily apprehended and retained. In the second place, in regard to the question what subjects a girl should study, and in what...
