Some thirty years ago J. G. Von Hahn attempted to interpret Greek and Teutonic mythology on the basis of naturalistic principles, though affirming an historical connection between them. His fundamental assumption was that the cycle of the seasons, owing to its importance for primitive man's food supply, formed the principal myth-making factor of the outside world, while the succession of day and night, meteorological conditions, and other natural phenomena, have contributed their share. The interpreter's first duty was accordingly to detect motives corresponding to these phenomena. Balder's death, from this standpoint, was taken to refer to the destruction of vegetation by autumnal drought. Thor and Hercules were conquerors of winter-monsters. Eurystheus symbolized the faint new moon, and Gunther's bent form, suspended from a nail, was the crescent of the moon. Without entering into a discussion of the popular-psychological basis of Hahn's system, it suffices to note that the constant error committed by him is the disregard of alternative possibilities, which is perhaps most strikingly illustrated by his conception of Gunther. When Ehrenreich interprets the rolling...
