Excerpt: . . . of his cello. --Continued in our next. As long as his mother was alive, ean Vignol, who was a model of filial devotion, had found enough to live for. But during the two years since he had been left alone, with no relatives, few friends, and the habits of a recluse, he found life in his lofty quarters very dull. He was now a man of forty-seven, with the beginnings of a corporation, a big black beard, a Socratic nose, kindly eyes, and just a topknot of hair on a head that was otherwise quite bald. As his health was not good and his stomach only second-rate, he had even had to give up the consolations of tobacco. Never had the commonplace characters in his tales, the kid-gloved assassins, the virtuous working girls, abused and abandoned by low, cowardly aristocrats, the generous young engineers...
