Excerpt from The Annual Address to the Candidates for Degrees and Licenses, in the Medical Institution of Yale College, January 21, 1840 Nature presents herself to our view, and at first all appears plain and simple but a closer inspection at once satisfies us that much is concealed from our sight-bounds are set to our researches, and she says at once, hitherto shalt thou come but no farther. All physicians regret that their art is rather a conjectural than a perfect one, and that a disease is some thing to be cured by probable means, rather than to be subdued with certainty by the efforts of reason. We should however always depend on our inductions, whether they relate to disease or any thing else, when the grounds we start from are fully known and perfectly understood but in numerous diseases there will be many inaccessible points, about which we are undecided, and here conjecture must occupy the place of argument, and probability that of fact.
