Excerpt: . . . till he reached the little creek, where he delivered the sand to one of the men who stood shoulder to shoulder in long rows for miles on either bank, all washing the sand and clay into the little creek, whose waters were turned to a yellow stream of mud. i It was in the afternoon that Bob and Harry arrived amidst this busy scene. They were bewildered. Neither had ever done any manual labor, so that it was not to be wondered at that they should be appalled, when they saw the men working as if for dear life. They were informed that they would have to report themselves at the government commissioners tent, and have their licenses inspected. A gold digger had a great grievance to trouble him, and that was the monthly payment of the license fee. This tax had been imposed...
