Excerpt: .issued a special bulletin on schoolhouses in 1914. In speaking of the general design of school buildings the bulletin says: A school building to properly serve its purpose should include in its plan and arrangement whatever may be necessary to permit the school work, for which it is intended, to be carried on under the most healthful and efficient conditions. The health and convenience of both teachers and scholars should be carefully considered. Due regard must be paid to economy in both the construction and the maintenance of the building. This means the use of good materials and substantial methods of construction. It is poor economy to use inferior materials and erect a cheap building which in the end will be expensive on account of the greater cost of maintenance and repair. No committee will gain any lasting credit from erecting this kind of..
