THE NATURE AND PATHOGENESIS OF ESSENTIAL EPILEPSY. Two fundamental principles were brought forward in my first thesis on the nature and pathogenesis of epilepsy: First, that there is invariably present an epileptic constitution or make-up in those individuals who later develop essential epilepsy. The nucleus of this personality defect is a temperament of extreme hypersensitiveness and egotism and all that these two main characteristics entail. This defect in character is not to be taken in any narrow or moralistic sense, but is to be considered as a temperamental defect in a broad, biologic view, a personality-defect which makes its possessor incapable of social adaptation in its best setting and which, if it remain uncorrected, renders the individual entirely inadequate to make a normal adult life. Secondly, that the seizure phenomenon in essential epilepsy is a direct outcome of the inability of..
