Skateboarding the railroad tracks into an oncoming train qualified nine-year-old Kevin Brendt for every psychiatric program in the county. Thus begins Judge Jacobs epic novel Millennial Family. In a small California town, we meet Kevin, a bipolar child who never felt part of his adopted Jewish family. On the day of his Bar Mitzvah, Kevin discovers that he is not Jewish and puts his family on notice, things are going to change. During his teenage years, Kevin searches for a new identity, turning to drugs and violence. Arrested for felony assault, Kevin thrives in jail as a white supremacist. He dumps Anna, his Jewish girlfriend, in favor of her best friend Jennifer, the one girl in town who is an atheist. Three years later they have a baby named Heather. Fleeing a drug war, Kevin moves his family to Texas in search of a normal life. The Brendts start a construction business in a Dallas suburb where everyone goes to church, but graft rules City Hall. Skirting the edge of the law, they have to accept Annas offer of help. Meanwhile, Heather becomes a believer, secretly baptized. Her parents discover that she is going to church and when Heather suffers a life-threatening injury, they realize that only her faith sustains Heather in her struggle to survive. Unable to escape his criminal past, Kevin battles a drug cartel and heeds Annas warning, If they find out who you are, theyll come after your family, and thats a game changer for sure. Kevins house becomes a fortress until the war shifts south of the border. With Heather now in a coma and Jennifer vowing to leave, if Kevin is to...
