She has all the qualities which succeed with your English people--a fine voice, a fine person, and pardon me if I add, an audacity, a vulgarity which will command applause. Were I more diplomatist I should say genius--where I say vulgarity--but this divine creature is adorably vulgar. She has no nerves. I say to her sing, and she sings. Attack me the A sharp, and she attacks, and the note rings out like a bell. She is without nerves, and she is without selfconsciousness, and she has the courage of a lion. She has worked as no pupil of mine ever worked before. She is mastering your difficult language in as many months as it cost me years. She has laboured at the theory of music, and though she is in most things of a surprising ignorance, she has made no mean progress...
