Not illustrated. 1898 Excerpt: . . . whose aim is to interest and instruct but whose effect is more often to mislead and misinform. The illustrations in recent books by Montgomery, Channing and McMaster are commended. Few of the maps used are considered satisfactory, many of them being inaccurate. Topical analyses and skeletons are characterized as harmless, dry, hard and dead, excepting, of course, such as students and teachers make for themselves. The report closes with a review of the leading features, commendable and otherwise, of the eighteen books examined. From this it appears that all have good points, none is perfect, all are great improvements upon their predecessors, and the ideal history yet remains to be written. Where schools are circumscribed and barred by the law from using the best book one can only pity; but where there is freedom teachers of history will surely find the work of selection greatly simplified...
