THE PROFESSIONALS IT was a Saturday at Aldersons. The great pleasure gardens in those long days of summer seemed like the playground of the whole west; the holiday crowds were pouring there now, out from the vigorous city whose youth is never tamed by summer heat, by the months that are only fresh and golden in that high country. To reach Alderson s the trolleys shot for more than three miles over the brilliant meadows, crossed the shallow, shining river and brought up with something of a grand-stand bump almost on the mountains slope. A man toiling in their wake looked after them wistfully; then he stared out over the fields upon fields of wild white poppies that danced in their dreams, nodding to the breeze and shimmering to the sun. Here and there was the gold of the dwarf sunflower; here and there the blue of that great headed blossom which later would cover the land with royal glory. There was not much woodland, but the birds, that were everywhere, made what they could of the low copses and the cottonwoods, and the whole morning rocked with their melody; this would be followed by solemn happy silences broken in their turn by flitting trolleys with their calling, laughing burdens. A hundred sun-steeped odours of growth, of fertility, of an abundance giving itself lightly to the wilderness, streamed mingling together in the fresh, warm air. The man had come out from the rich markets of...
