In teaching Domestic Economy one is led to observe that the interest of the class depends on their perception of the direct connection between this lesson and life. Practices familiar from babyhood step out of the corners of their minds and link themselves on to troublesome theories. Each illuminates the other. Everyday life was dull; scientific theory was difficult; on a sudden they have both become easy and interesting. And as very often happens in after-life, the dunce and the scholar change places in class. But this combination of science and practice is precisely what makes Domestic Economy difficult to teach, and still more difficult to write about. Every science is laid under contribution by turns.
