The Circumstance which confers its proper value upon the sacrifice of Christ. The value of this expiatory sacrifice is not to be estimated from the divine appointment alone; nor merely from the kind or intensity of sufferings which our blessed Saviour endured; but from His True and Essential Deity. This is that relative consideration, just mentioned, which confers Its Own dignity upon the constituted person of the Messiah, and upon his whole mediatorial work. It is the opinion of some eminent critics, and appears to me supported by probable evidence, that to this grand circumstance our text refers, in saying that Christ THROUGH THE ETERNAL SPIRIT, offered himself. On this holy ground I advance with trembling and anxiety, lest I should darken counsel by words without knowledge. Presumption, curiosity, and the affectation of knowledge beyond what revelation permits, --I solemnly disown....
