Excerpt from Pocahontas: Or the Indian Maiden Action on his part, stopped the Indians from shooting so rapidly, as they feared they might kill one of their own tribe, but yet many arrows pierced his clothes, and some slightly wounded him. Walking backwards, trying thus to reach his boat, with the Indian still held in front of him for a shield, and watching his pursuers all the time, he suddenly sunk to his waist in a creek that was behind him. So fearful were the Indians of the pistol which he still held in his hand, having never Seen such a weapon before, that they would not come near him until he threw it far away, finding, that unless he did so, he would surely die of cold. They then seized him, dragged him to a fire, along side of which his two companions lay dead, and rubbing his limbs smartly, they, after a long time brought back the warmth. He was then led forward to a tree. To which he was tied, and the Indians were about to shoot him with their arrows, when the chief, to whom Captain Smith had given a.
