Excerpt from The Yale Literary Magazine, Vol. 61: November, 1895 With the rise of athletics in the college mans estimation also came the importance of the college world to the newspaper public. Where formerly appeared a stray Commencement or Junior Exhibition program and occasional squibs on the town and gown riots, now has expanded into long-winded accounts on the most trivial college matters, and ridiculously minute descriptions of the crew and eleven. With pardonable self-assertion we may say that Yale has always occupied a prominent place in college athletics, and consequently has both basked in public favor and been satirized through the treacherous duplicity of newspaper correspondents. Happily for us, however, the true romance of our college life, ever changing, ever new, lies beyond the omnivorous grasp of the modern press. No matter how numerous and varied may be the details, or how studied and felicitous the modes of expression, the true picturesqueness and real delight which graduates and undergraduates love to picture in their fireside dreams of when I was in college, are forever closed to the newspaper. Not for...
