Excerpt from The Omegan, Vol. 10: March 1933 Bucknell's new program, therefore, is designed first of all to correct this difficulty in so far as possible. There are at present two distinct major trends with respect to the relations of general and professional training in American higher education. In the first place, an effort is being made in practically all of the major professions to place as much as possible of their professional training on a graduate basis, and in the second place to free the undergraduate years, in so far as possible, of professional and pre professional requirements so that these years may be devoted to a genuine liberal culture. The profession of medicine is leading the way in these matters. Two summary paragraphs from the Final Report of the Commission of Medical Education, which has just come from the press, emphasize these trends.
