This is a distinction from B. coli, which causes the medium to become red, coagulates it, and produces gas. If the medium contains 1 Z glucose in place of the lactose, B. ty. produces redness and coagulation within twentyfour hours at 37 C. This is a distinction from the dysentery bacillus which does not produce redness within twenty-four hours, and only produces coagulation later. Both form gas and fluorescence in test 9, and produce coagulation in litmus glucose nutrose solution.
