Excerpt: .out together, but those who did get out first were not even up to their knees in water. The old man, who was too helpless to more, and the young man were the last, and they were lifted into the water by the Turks, who immediately rowed off. The river side deepens rapidly at this place, so that these two unfortunate men were in much deeper water than their companions. Whether they could have saved themselves without assistance is doubtful, but there is no doubt whatever that they might easily have been saved by others. At the moment the Jews began to leave the boat, the Rourman soldiers, about 20 in number, were ordered to line the shore and prevent the Jews from landing; some of the soldiers were arm, -d, the others were not, at all events the poor Jews were not only...
