Excerpt from Education, Vol. 43: A Monthly Magazine Devoted to the Science, Art, Philosophy and Literature of Education; September, 1922 June, 1923 I. What is adolescence? A. Physiologically. B. Psychologically. II. What is the relation of the school to the adolescent? Most people understand that a human being, in the progress from birth to death, passes through certain stages of growth and development each characterized by peculiar activities or traits. It is not our purpose here to deal with any of these periods except one. The student, the scientist, the practical man of affairs, the mother and even the poet agree that the period known as the teens is the most important because certain social instincts then become more pronounced and begin to shape the individual permanently in both body and mind. As teachers we have been slow to fall into line, and we have made no change, or very little, in the way we have handled the boys and girls in the high school, from that which was used in the grades. But we are waking up. We are indebted to psychology...
