Excerpt: . . . a quantity of air-slaked lime, flowers of sulphur and charcoal (pounded up into a powder). This was placed round the affected plants, and indeed on every inch of soil in the frames. If this fungus is carefully watched it will be seen that it spreads all over the surface of the soil, and in a very short time the whole of the plants will be affected. In my case the above remedy was thoroughly effectual, with one exception. This was in a frame where the soil had sunk some 10 inches or 12 inches from the glass, and it was necessary to dress this two or three Bromeliaceous plants. --I am asked by a reader from Manchester if these can be grown with Cattleyas and Odontoglossum. Most certainly, and without the slightest ill effects to either. I am not so sure about the temperature...
