Handrail Joint.--Usually a butt joint secured with a joint screw, otherwise handrail screw, which has a right and left hand thread each working in a nut with notches, both the nuts being buried in holes sunk near the ends of the two lengths of rail. By turning the nuts the joint is tightened up, after which the holes are stopped with pieces of wood to match, and the mouldings of the handrail finished off with handrail planes. Sometimes, however, the connection is made with a splice joint, which is a species of scarf, the planes of junction being horizontal and vertical when the rail is in position. Heading Joint is formed between lengths...
