Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Leonidas mind soared above a factory of fear, letting his memory resume the endless toil of telling his life's tale. But he felt it. The end was drawing near. The Immortals rushed at him as his memory continued to wade the abysmal calm of battle. Everything unfolded in slow motion around him, and memory only allowed half-voices to break through the bruised silence. The Persian hordes moved in a stream unrelenting, their king, Xerxes, casting a wide, fleeting gaze that, to the Spartan king, remained beyond shattering. For a moment, Leonidas eyes moved swiftly upon the ghostly stream. The god of light is nowhere to be seen. Leonidas peers through the murky distance and imagines seeing Xerxes seated beneath a truncated mass of burnished gold. He imagines seeing his empire-sized gaze through the dark, rendering motes of dust agleam under a brutal mortal sun. Some of the Spartans raise their shields while others are impaled. The spears break through bodies hardened with hearts unwavering. Blood-dimmed bodies consumed by a blackness entire now waver in an indefatigable mortal breeze. Death comes sweetly upon the fallen, its soothing breath lifting memories that span their lives entire, memories glowing with Greece. Leonidas closes his eyes. He drifts beneath the sparkling red surface, hearing the sound of something steadily drowning. But then he realizes that the inaudible sound belongs to a tide unlike any other. A tide that allows the world's most ancient memory to rise and take hold of tomorrow's unknown. He remains motionless as he hovers precariously between the surface and the deep. Bubbles rise but then wander aimlessly. He is a shadow drifting down toward the dark ocean floor. He...
