Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Speech of Lord Viscount Morpeth, on the Irish Tithe Bill, in the House of Commons, on Thursday, June 2, 1836 Lord Viscount Morpeth. - Having had but too frequent occasions to deliver my sentiments on this question, I feel that I should have little excuse, and still less temptation, for again presenting myself to the House, were it not for the desire I have to answer any objections, as well as to remove any misapprehensions, which appear to me to have arisen in the course of the debate. I do not feel myself at all constrained to enter into any controversy as to the general principle upon which this, as well as every other proposal of appropriation, rests. We make no secret of that professing principle - we avow at once that it is our intention to act upon it; and whether the burden, which it has been both graphically and rhetorically represented to entail upon us, be light or heavy, at least we make no complaint of it, and it has not yet broken...
