The aristocracy could not look with favor upon the rise in the price of silk, they being the chief consumers of the commodity. A more serious disturbance of the trade, was the hostile attitude assumed by the ronin toward the native merchants dealing with foreigners. Some silk merchants were driven from their houses, others were even killed. The paternal government issued, in 1860, a circular declaring that all merchandise must first be brought to Yedo, to be there examined and approved for sale, before it can See London Economist, June 2-5, 1887. Three years later, alarmed at the scarcity of silk, it warned all merchants to regard the future of Japan and act accordingly, for the benefit of the country at large. Silk was one of the two articles, the other being tea, which most attracted the attention of American merchants in Japan. But, until the Centennial Exhibition, it was an insignificant item of import. Of the whole quantity of raw silk imported into the United States, amounting to 10,000 bales annually, previous to the Centennial, only one-tenth came from Japan and Europe. For eight years previous to 1876, the annual average of the import of the Japan silk into the States was 97 bales, and in that year only 88 bales were sold in New York. The Exhibition served as...
