Excerpt from The Poultryman and Pomologist, Vol. 1: Devoted to Practical Poultry and Fruit Culture; April, 1900 It was the Monarch incubator of which, for the benefit of those who have never seen it, I will describe the heating system. Above the egg chamber is the main water tank, of oblong shape, the top of which is concave the lowest point being at the centre where the ventilator is situated and the highest points at each end: One end of the tank is connected by a pipe with the top of a smaller tank or heater outside of the main incubator, this latter tank covering the lamp. A pipe runs from the bottom of the outside tank into the incubator, makes a coil around the boiler, thence ascending at the back end and connecting with the main tank thus completing the circuit. From one high end of the main tank an open upright tube is attached. In this tube a float resting on the water would rise and fall with the expansion and contraction of the water in the tank. This float...
