Not illustrated. 1883 Excerpt: . . . part of the house, and, at the moment when the boat grounded at the Sea-Gate Mrs. Tregarthen was receiving a confession from her husband. He was standing at the window from which he had watched her on her first visit to the island and was telling her, with no shamefacedness, how he had kept her in sight after he parted from her. It was not from any standpoint but her own a deed to be rewarded, but she kissed him for it with all her heart, and they went gaily out together for a ramble on the cliffs. Before they started, Tregarthen took a look at the approaching party through the single-barrelled operaglass. We can go out with a clear conscience, my dear, he said; there is no one we know amongst them. They had not left the house long when an architects clerk came racing after them, and asked Tregarthens presence. The architect himself was on the ground, and desired his opinion on some question or another which could only be decided on the spot. Walk on, said Tregarthen to his wife, I shall overtake you. She answered with a smile and a nod, and rambled slowly over the verdurous slopes, and enjoyed the fresh sea-breeze. In a while she looked back, and, seeing no sign of her husband, she sate in the shelter of an overhanging boulder, and sinking down in the soft mosses, surrendered herself to happy broodings upon her husband, her home,...
