Excerpt: .By measuring the fall thus produced, the pressure of the vapor of various liquids at different temperatures may be determined. Another way to illustrate the pressure exerted by the vapor, of a liquid is to pour a little of the liquid into a flask, so that it may evaporate into the air which the flask contains. If the flask is corked tightly as soon as the liquid is poured in, a considerable pressure may be generated. In fact, explosions sometimes occur from this cause. To measure the pressure, a tube may be passed through the cork into some mercury in the bottom of the flask (see Fig. 67), and the liquid should be injected by means of a medicine-dropper passing through the cork beside this tube, so as to avoid losing the pressure generated by evaporation before the cork can be put into its place. It has been found by experiment that the quantity of liquid which evaporates in a flask already containing air, and the pressure which it generates, are exactly the same as in a space from which the air has been completely exhausted. This discovery (known as Dalton s Law) is believed to show that the molecules of a gas occupy very little space in comparison with the space between them, into which a liquid may evaporate. In any case, the height to which the mercury column is raised in Fig. 67 is the same as its depression in Fig. 66, other...
